Freedom, the Joys of which were hard to describe and best known to those who had lacked it for a time, had no doubt been won after great struggle, sacrifice, and suffering. But those noble ancestors who had fought for it, had not fought for themselves alone but for all their fellowmen and for posterity. It was against God's will, against all the lessons of history, to deny freedom to those who had not taken part in the fight or to leave them to fight their own battle again. Hygiene taught that a man's health depends not on his own personal cleanliness only, but also upon that of everyone else around him. Philosophy taught that man's happiness is built upon that of others. So, freedom was no true freedom unless it were shared with all one's fellowmen.
