Students ought to be good students before they can be anything else. The most desirable and significant role that they can play is to become better students. They should develop a genuine taste for a subject and then study it with a spirit of dedication. If India wants to come abreast of and then keep pace with the advanced countries in the West, our students will have to take their studies more seriously. Our students have a better potential than their counterparts in the West; it simply needs exploitation and proper channelization. Nature lays bare all its mysteries to the West; heavens send all their benedictions to the West. It is because people in the West are more inquisitive; their thirst for knowledge is more acute. The more they know, the more they wish to know. And like the legendary Ulysses, with their gray spirits ever yearning for more and more knowledge, they follow it like a sinking star 'beyond the utmost verge of human thought'. They have broken fresh grounds and widened the horizons of knowledge. It is because they are more alive to the needs of their times and realize their obligations more fully. It is true that laboratories in our colleges are ill-equipped and the general atmosphere is not very encouraging but when was that an obstruction to a dedicated soul? Did Edison have a very modernized laboratory with a very congenial atmosphere to work in? Let our students develop an Edison-like zeal and determination for work, and soon a new star will rise in the firmament.

Questions:

- 1) According to writer, what kind of role can students play significantly and desirably?
- 2) What will happen if the students take their study seriously?
- 3) What does writer say about the people of West?
- 4) According to writer which kind of zeal is to be developed by the students?
